The University of Montana offers new online graduate courses in strategic studies and leadership that often are required for international management positions in the public, private and non-profit sectors. The courses are designed for military and government personnel, as well as early and mid-career professionals and graduate students aspiring to or already involved in meaningful engagement with the world. The goal is to enhance your knowledge and professional skills in the realm of international affairs. Each course carries three credits and is part of a full Masters Degree program in international security and leadership that The University of Montana plans to offer beginning Fall Semester 2011.

Terrorism and Counter-Terrorism: MANS 595, Section 1

An examination of the philosophical, political, historic, and religious roots of terrorist activity, as well as the national and global effects of acts of terrorism. The financing of terrorist activity, along with the unique threats of suicide bombers, weapons of mass destruction, narco-terrorism, cyber-terrorism, bio-terrorism, will also be addressed. Students completing the course will gain a substantive understanding of terrorism and counterterrorism principles, and be able to articulate both past and current national and international responses to terrorism. The course will better prepare students to work in an interagency, multicultural counter-terrorism environment. Instructor: Dr. James Taylor

Insurgency in Afghanistan: MANS 595, Section 2

An in-depth exploration of the origins, trends and ramifications of the current Taliban-led insurgency in Afghanistan. Starting with the Communist coup of 1978, the course traces the systematic breakdown of the country’s traditional systems of rule during the Soviet occupation period (1979-1989), the Afghan civil war of the 1990s and the current conflict against the Taliban. The strengths and weaknesses of the leadership and composition of the insurgency in Afghanistan are also examined. The course concludes with an examination of some of the possible outcomes for the war and alternative strategies that may be more effective in meeting the goals of the U.S.-led international coalition. Instructor: Mr. Owen Sirrs

Managing & Leading in Multicultural Environments: MANS 595, Section 3

The purpose of this course is to develop a deeper understanding and effective skills for managing and leading individuals and groups from cultural backgrounds other than own. Through readings and practical examples and exercises, students will examine their own cultural background, attitudes, values, and biases, and gain knowledge of tools and techniques to avoid cultural misunderstanding and interact effectively with real-life challenges in multicultural environments around the world. Instructor: Dr. Udo Fluck
